A strong partnership between school and home is key to student success. Active engagement of parents plays a vital role in the child's development and can lead to improved academic performance, greater motivation, and enhanced social skills.

There are several ways in which parents can engage with the school and stay involved in their child's education. The obvious step is to ensure they are up to date with all related school information and would involve checking Toddle regularly, reading the newsletter etc. However, greater engagement can happen through measures such as guest sessions by parents (could be subject related or career related), collaborating with the school for school events, or simply by sharing information with the school about existing learning opportunities. Finally, parents are a crucial source of feedback for the school as they are well placed to provide information/insights into areas that are working well or which need to be improved.

As we progress deeper into the academic year, I would like to call for parents to come forward and contribute through guest lectures, career related talks, or organizing field trips. We will also be sharing a survey towards the end of this month to gather feedback on different areas of the school. Your inputs will help us analyse areas of focus and improvement as well as provide assurance regarding aspects that are working well.
